How does NHS England manage to achieve one of the highest seasonal influenza vaccination rates

George Kassianos

National Immunisation Lead Royal College of General Practitioners, UK

The National Health Service England consistently achieves high seasonal influenza vaccination rates. The presenter will discuss the role on the immunisation experts and their relation to the Department of Health, the responsibilities the experts put on the Department of Health in taking and implementing decisions on seasonal influenza vaccination, the clearly defined groups at risk and how the flu vaccine is provided for the national influenza immunisation programme as well as the incentives General Practitioners and Pharmacists receive and their role in the campaign.
